It was a grave responsibility at my age—near eighty—to become the father of a child. It was 10 hasty or ill-considered resolution, but a deliberate one, full of purpose and meaning; and I would have you believe that I was actuated by the highest and most exalted motives, in which my wife fully shared. An ambition to rear a son, who would be able to take up my task when I must lay it down, has possessed me for more than a quarter of a century. And this I say without prejudice, to my noble and talented son, Dr. Ellot (Gorton), whose ambition is different from mine, though not less
